"Well, first of all, I guess we'll roam around, so you will feel at home," said Santa. "You must meet my elves. They're clever little men."

"They've spent their lives at making things. Just think what happiness that brings. They work all year, till Christmas. Then they start right in again."

Then Santa took the Tynmites to a lot of shops. They shortly knew all of the elves in Santa Land. "We're glad you came," said one. "Our work has piled up very high, and my, oh my, how time flies by. You'll find that there is plenty that you Tynmites can do."

Another elf said, "Mercy me! You must be hungry as can be, 'cause you have traveled quite a ways to reach this far-off place."

"We have a lunch room near at hand, with counters where you all can stand." "Say, that sounds fine," said Duncy, with a broad smile on his face.

The bunch then heard old Santa say, "I haven't eaten much today, so I guess I will join you in a little bit of lunch."

"The work you'll do can wait until you youngsters eat and have your fill." Then, as they ate, wee Goidy said, "This was a dandy lunch."

When lunch was over, Santa Claus said, "Dotty, come with me, because I think that you can do one little job I have in mind."

"You other Tynmites wait right here. I'll come back to you, never fear." And then to Dotty he said, "This is a job you will not mind."

The shop of fine dolls soon was found, and lots of dolls were standing 'round. "I want their faces painted," said old Santa, with a smile.

"Oh, I'll love this," wee Dotty said. "I'll make their cheeks a real nice red. Come back and see how I am doing, in a little while."
